How to Tell a Good Ghost Story. A most valuable point in a ghost story, a point too much neglected, is mystery. People seem to think that details add to the interest and make the thing more plausible, whereas a judicious mystery often produces a more pleasurable feeling of horror. What can be more simple than the anecdote of a man in perfect health and easy circumstances who insisted on passing a night in a haunted room, and who next morning was found quite mad and capable of saving nothing but "The Claws! The Claws!" That leaves everything to the imagination, which half unconsciously produces a shape of the utmost vague horror out of two simple words. Mrs. Crowe has a quite charming tale of two lads who wished to play a trick at a wake. They secretly took the body of the dead out of the coffin, and hid it in an outhouse, while one of them lay down in the place of the corpse, and was to rise at a signal from his confederate. The signal was given in due time, and repeated, with no effect. Then they found the sham dead man dead in earnest; but on looking in the out-house they never found the real, original corpse, which is still missing. There is a horrible blank here, in which the fancy inserts half-realized ideas of terror. One of the best ghost stories of late years has an equally unexplained margin of mystery. Two men of the same regiment (the colonel and a much younger officer) go to stay at the house of a lately married friend of the elder warrior. They arrive just before dinner, and, after dressing and going into the drawing-room, find themselves alone with their host. The lady of the house sends a message to the effect that she hopes they will not wait for her, and they do not wait, but enter the dining-room. A moment afterwards the lady appears with a white face; and, as soon as she comes in, May. the younger guest becomes as white as herself. After a few minutes he rises, stammers out some incoherent excuses, and makes his way from the room. As soon as he can his friend follows him, finds nim standing in the drive under a tree, and naturally asks for explanation. "I saw the figure that came in with Lady X." answers Baron."—Boston Globe. figure that came in with Lady X.," answers the friend. "What figure?" asks the elder man, thinking his friend has lost his wits. "The tall figure in the plaid that stood behind her, and pointed at the knife beside her plate." At this moment a horse's hoofs clatter down the drive, and the groom, galloping past, has time to say that Lady X. has cut her throat with a knife. That is the whole. Whether Lady X. recovered or not, and what the figure may have been, and whether she, too, saw it-all that is left delightfully and horribly vague. Contrast that with one of the marvels of the spiritualists, the ghastly story where the extraordinary conduct of a golden-haired little girl, who blasphemes ceaselessly, is explained by a seer who detects the apparition of a hideous old woman lurking behind and prompting the child. The tale is told in one of the American books of doctrine, and is there expanded and worse than spoiled by a long account of how it all happened, and what became of the seer, the ghost, and the little girl, who probably ended as a very precocious pupil-teacher. Ghost stories way. The little details at the outset that give an air of reality may be as minute as you please. Then comes the moment of suspense, and "eeriness"; then, suddenly, your ghost, "a very fearful wild fowl," not to be described too precisely. If a dog or a horse can see him first, and fall into the staggers or show canine symptoms of supernatural dread, so much the hetter.

Well now spend their evenings of ting pen-holders, gazing at the wall, and trying to think of rhymns for "my Valentine."—

Four hundred miles at the average rate of atmospheric speed would not, in his opinion, occupy twenty-four hours. Mr. Coxwell's plan is well calculated to startle the uniniated in aërostatistics.

There is a pleasant way of meeting the annoyance of tobacco-smoke. Non-smokers, by daily partaking of onions, will find that they can emit almost as much fragrance as the pipe-wagglers and cigar-burners. In cases where there are five smokers to one non-smoker in a room, garlic is more useful than the onion, and close conversations will sufficiently discover its merits. The gay and festive-looking beasts pranced along in fine style, "heads up and tails a-risin'," as our John verton, Lewnel Mewnerton, and Samuel would say. Governor Thayer was invited haste, fearing he would be arrested for to take a ride, and was driven about for travelling under aliases .- Hawkeye. some time by Dexter. Indicative of the general character of eight to six cents per copy : upon Washington with his 100,000 is the fact that he has made a contract with a Vermont quarry to furnish him immediately with 99,999 tombstones, on which blank spaces are to be left for the names, but the line "Killed at the Battle of Washington, February 14, 1877," is to be cut on every one of them. The fact that General Watterson has not ordered any stone to be filled out with his own name is to be regarded as suggesting why only 99,999 stones have been ordered.—Burlington Hawkeye.

Remembered Days.

I remember a morn behind the mill,
When blackbirds sazg,
And sheep-bells rang,
Ext off, and all things elte were still
But the ristug bream
In the pictured stream,
And the noise of water about the mill.

And though I know the days are spent,

The Ivy Wall.

That love was lost
When came the frost
At summer's close of my content;
Yet some by stays
In winter days

'Twas sweet to wait by the lvy wall,
When the long day's toll was o'er.
Till I heard the sound of a soft footfall,
And her hand unclosed the door;
The shadows trembled, the lights were red,
And the world seemed miles away.
And the ivy whisperings over her head
Still sing in my ears to-day.

A row of houses, showy and tall,
Stand up where the try grew
On the crumbling bricks of the dear old wall—
So the old gives place to new!
And the face—ah! well, 'twas long ago,
And the world will claim its own;
But I dream my dream, and the red lights gleam
As I go my way alone.
